The truth about chemical peels

Everything you need to know before your first treatment

Hyperpigmentation (melasma)

Chemical peels are an important part of skin health. As an effective treatment option for most skin types and concerns, they improve tone, texture, fine lines and wrinkles, breakouts and dark spots, but many people are intimidated to go in for their first peel treatment. The fear of leaving with a bright red face that hurts prevents some from experiencing the many benefits of a peel. The post-peel reality is a glowing, healthy complexion. Here's everything you need to know before your first PCA SKIN chemical peel:

Peeling is exfoliation. When your skin peels or flakes after a treatment your skin is shedding dead or damaged surface cells and revealing new, healthy skin cells on the surface. This action is called cell turnover. Supporting the cell turnover process with chemical peels is what allows the skin to shed dead cells and bring new, fresh skin to the surface, free of signs of aging, sun damage, dirt and debris. The result is glowing skin.

PCA Peel® with Hydroquinone & Resorcinol

You won't necessarily experience visible peeling. That doesn't mean your treatment was ineffective. Everyone experiences different levels of peeling, dependent upon skin type, resilience, type of peel and the number of layers applied. Some people experience 'sheeting,' when large portions of the skin peel off at once. Some experience 'flaking,' when small pieces of skin peel off, similar to dry, winter skin or mild peeling after a sunburn. Others experience exfoliation that is not visible. If you don't peel, your skin is still exfoliating. In this case, the exfoliation is happening on a cellular level that can't be seen by the naked eye.

Peels are easy to work into a busy lifestyle. There is no downtime with PCA SKIN chemical peels — you'll leave your appointment with a healthy glow and able to carry on with your regular activities. There are steps to ensure that your results are maximized. Your clinician will give you more detailed instructions after your procedure, catered to your skin's needs.
